

The Enchanters-Realization

As he neared the beach he began to feel an intense dread. This was like no other storm he had ever seen before. He was used to seeing roiling clouds and brilliant flashes of lightening accompanied by enormous peels of thunder, and wind so powerful that he could lean far into it and not fall. But this storm was so powerful that it seemed to almost have a life of its own. He shook that thought from his mind as the clouds rolled into shore, rising from the ocean surface in a convex gray-green mass that was to all appearances solid and glowed from the constant static discharge of lightening. The thunder did not come in peals; it came as one long low and very loud rumble. The sea receded so quickly that scores of fish were left flopping in small pools. His heart pounded in his chest, as he saw not a hurricane approach: but death. Though the wind driven rain pummeled his eyes, he could not close them even to blink. He stared wide-eyed as the front drew closer. He wanted to run as fast as he could but a force stronger than instinct held him in place. From behind him a faint glow began to intrude on his terrified reverie. Slowly and reluctantly he turned his head, still keeping his eyes on the storm. At last he had to see what this new threat was and he looked behind and saw what appeared to be a bluish gold comet make its way to the sea. He looked on in amazement as it stopped at the break of the waves and then rose to a considerable height, stopped again and fell with incredible speed into the ocean. It crashed into the water and the sea began to boil with what he could only describe as an electric blue. Orbs of an even brighter electric blue jettied about in the boiling water and a column of water began to rise high into the air creating a fountain. The orbs rose and fell within the fountain. He looked on and his eyes saw what his mind could not believe nor comprehend. Three beings began to take form at the top of the fountain. Two faced out to sea and the other faced land. The one that faced land appeared to be a woman; the two out to sea were men. They were clothed in the same electric blue as the fountain and orbs, but yet their raiment seemed to be purer. I woke with a start from the images of one of the most, no, the most lucid dream I had ever had, sat up in bed and tried to shake off the feelings it created in me. But it was useless. I went through the morning routine and then went out to my car for the drive to the mountains where I get a lot of ideas for my landscaping business. When I got to one of my favorite places I walked along the trail taking in as much of the beauty of nature as I could, from the tallest trees to the smallest wild flower. I listened to every sound, smelled every smell and felt all I could feel. As I walked I felt closer and closer to all around me, but yet it seemed as though I didn't quite fit in with the wild. I didn't want to be just another human walking a trail, a well-worn path. So I left the trail that perhaps thousands had trod. As I went further and further from the path I felt more at ease and, more ill-at ease. Something was still wrong. At last I came to a hill that was covered in thick wild grass and tall leafy trees that seemed to be a sanctuary of the woods. It was incredibly beautiful and peaceful. Towards the crest of the hill was a large boulder that was somewhat flat on top. I climbed on top and stood looking all around me. The wind blew the leaves in such a way as to sound like the voices of the trees themselves. Small forest dwellers scurried and rustled in the branches and on the ground. They seemed to know that I meant no harm. One little Chipmunk was even bold enough to join me on the boulder for a brief moment. I sat down, closed my eyes and just soaked up the peace and quiet. In the near distance I heard a small waterfall, it seemed to be on the other side of the hill. I decided to go and explore this falls, but felt as though I should remain where I was a lit
