

Topiary--A Novel

This futuristic and highly satiric novel is actually set, just like George Orwells 1984, not in the future at all but in the present itself, a present that the author (again like Orwell) sets out to portray as it actually is rather than as people have grown accustomed to it in an unthinking acceptance. In Topiary, the central character goes by the name of Plantman. He earlier worked as writer for an enormous ad agency, but now, having switched careers from death to life and from falsehood to growth, he is hired by a company called Topiary Techniques to water and otherwise nurture and care for the only green and living things in the great business towers of The City, namely, the green plants that have been supplied to corporate directors by Topiary Techniques in order to bring some bit of life into the hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dead cubicles and offices throughout The City. Partly Candide, partly the Thoreau of Walden, partly Johnny Appleseed, and partly the free-associating mind of the highly literary novelist himself, Plantman travels both inwardly and outwardly, meeting all the citys most influential (and just as often, cruelly or blindly destructive) denizens. In the end, Plantman very nearly dies from a hideous disease symbolizing the power of The Citys toxicity (both literal and moral) over the powers of the green, organic, and natural: That is, over the powers of life. Still, a touch of hope does bless novels end as Plantman sets forth on one last quest that may--if were very, very lucky--save us all.
